Why Do We Do a Summer Camp Program?

4-H Youth Development Programming uses 4 fundamental needs of youth when creating programming. These themes include Belonging, Independence, Mastery, and Generosity. A well developed and implemented summer camp program will incorporate these components. Camp programs impact both youth who attend as campers, teen counselors who serve as counselors and also adults who attend camp as volunteer staff. The impact of summer camp programs can be seen throughout and are long lasting.

Young people want a sense of Belonging. Camp programs achieve this by working on team building activities at camp counselor trainings. By connecting the group as a team, actions become group actions and success of the camp becomes a goal of the entire group. Campers’ need for belonging is achieved by creating a welcoming environment for the campers from the minute they arrive. Counselors are trained on how to create a welcoming and friendly environment and how to build a sense of team amongst their group.

The final need that camp fills for young people is the need for Generosity. Young people want to feel that they can contribute too. This is especially evident in the counselors who give of their time to come to camp and fill a very important roll. Camps also provide a feeling of generosity by building into the schedule various activities that allow the campers to contribute, like; camp clean up, invasive plant pulling or some camps will plan a specific community service project and will have each camper contribute throughout their week.

These are the targets of a summer camp program. Whenever new programming is implemented, these are the basic needs a camp director is attempting to provide the youth attending their camp. If you have additional questions about camp or have ideas for new camp programs feel free to call Neil Klemme, 4-H Youth Development Educator, at the UW-Extension Office at 715-561-2695.
